When the interface outgrew its original logic

Early versions of the interface had only a few tools, placed naturally where space allowed.

As the product evolved, new tools were added wherever there was available space, without a shared structure guiding placement.

As results

- tools were visible but spread across different areas

- placement followed space, not workflow

- spatial consistency was hard to maintain

Scattered tools broke scan flow and added chair time.